City Briefs

OBVIOUS OLIVER

"I don't like to bother you with hunting stories, but a friend of a friend of mine, who runs a Lerner up at the Gardner, told me the best one yet last night and I can't help but tell you the story." This to the pessimist who believes half of what he sees and nothing that he hears.

"Shoot," he answered.
"I was out hunting for ten days," opened the Tool Nipper to his friend on the machine. "Me, my father, brother and another good deer hunter. We were over in the Patagonia country and camped three miles from the game warden's house. Deer were plentiful. We had just secured six fine bucks for the party and left them out in front of our tents when up came a great big rain. It poured so hard that we were unable to get of the shelter to bring the carcasses in. Consequently, the meat was ruined."

"Undaunted, we started out the next morning to get another supply. Me and my father went up the middle of the canyon and the other two fellows skirted the sides. We had gone but a little ways when we jumped a fine bunch of deer."

"My father ran to one side and shot. I could hear shooting from the other fellows and in my haste forgot to take the safety from my gun. I aimed but the gun wouldn't discharge. In the meantime the other fellows had gotten in front of the deer and had turned them back toward me. A fine, four pronged buck came racing for me and fearing that I might be run over I raised my gun and hit the deer over the head with the butt end of it. As he fell I saw what was the matter with my rifle and, releasing the safety, shot him through the side."

"When we counted up the party had seven deer."

"But don't tell anyone about it as the game warden might get wise."

"Just at that minute the drill stuck and the Nipper declared to my friend that he was late and had to beat it."

A pause ensued, the pessimist looking exceedingly grieved. He found his voice, finally, with, "Say Oliver, there do be some peculiar people working in these mines, don't they?"
